New Berlin, Wis. – Devin McKinnon from New Berlin Eisenhower has been chosen to present at the national Project Lead The Way (PLTW) conference – PLTW Summit 2016 – in Indianapolis later this month.

PLTW, a nonprofit organization that provides a transformative learning experience for K-12 students and teachers across the U.S., serves more than 8,000 schools and 1 million students. The School District of New Berlin offers PLTW's Gateway to Technology to seventh- and eighth-graders, and engineering, biomedical and computer science programs to secondary students. All New Berlin students enrolled in a PLTW course have an opportunity to earn college credits through Milwaukee School of Engineering.

PLTW Summit 2016 will gather more than 1,500 attendees – including educators, students, and leaders from the business and government sectors – March 20-23. In more than 150 presentations, presenters will share strategies and best practices on empowering and engaging students to develop the knowledge and skills needed to thrive in their careers and lives. Attendees will learn innovative approaches for making classroom learning relevant, engaging, and hands-on, as well as connecting industry and community partners to learning.

“Professional development is a cornerstone of the transformational learning experience PLTW provides to students and teachers across the United States,” said PLTW Senior Vice President and Chief Communications Officer Dorothy Gorman. “We set the bar high for PLTW Summit presentations to provide unique learning opportunities for our guests. When we reviewed the hundreds of proposals, we were blown away by the innovative ideas and array of experiences they represented. PLTW Summit guests will enjoy the chance to network, collaborate, get inspired by, and learn from these outstanding workshops.”

McKinnon will be presenting Discover the Hidden Powers of LMS Collaboration. This presentation will be given in partnership with Angelica Gunderson from Los Alisos Middle School in Norwalk, Cali.
